OSHA fines company in Blair following employee's death

BLAIR, Wis. (WEAU) - 123 Engineering Corporation is fined by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration following the death of an employee.

According to a summary of the incident from OSHA, on March 23, 2024, an employee was utilizing surface supplied air diving equipment to clean sediment from the inside of an enclosed standpipe water tank with a 24-foot water depth. Due to fatigue, the employee fell to the bottom of the tank.

After a couple of employees attempted to rescue the employee in the incident, they called 911.

It took four people to pull the employee from the water and up through the hatchway opening, OSHA's summary says.

After attempting life-saving measures, the employee was pronounced dead at the scene.

According to OSHA's summary, it was determined that drowning was the primary cause of the employee's death.

Investigation Summary

An employee was utilizing surface supplied air diving equipment to clean sediment from the inside of an enclosed standpipe water tank with a 24-foot water depth. The estimated water temperature was 53.42 degrees Fahrenheit. Sediment cleaning was performed using a hand-held vacuum/scrubber attached to a 3-inch by 90-foot section of flexible vacuum pipe used inside of the tank. Employee #1 reported to the tender and team lead via helmet radio comms that he thought there may be a leak in the drysuit. The team lead advised Employee #1 to exit the water if he thought there was a leak, however, Employee #1 decided that everything was okay, and the dive was continued. Employee #1 later reported that he felt cold but continued working. At approximately 4:50 p.m., less than one hour into the dive, Employee #1 again reported that he was cold, and the decision was made to have Employee #1 egress the tank so they could switch divers as Employee #1 was too cold to continue working. Employee #1 ascended from the tank bottom by climbing the umbilical. After reaching the surface, Employee #1 was unable to hold onto the egress ladder and due to fatigue, the weight of the diving gear and soft pipe, which became entangled in the umbilical, Employee #1 descended back to the tank bottom. The team lead and tender attempted to rescue Employee #1. The team leader then made the decision to call 911 to report a diver in the water and assistance was needed. It took four people (team leader and three EMS personnel) to pull Employee #1 from the water and up through the hatchway opening. After attempting on-scene life-saving measures, Employee #1 was pronounced dead at the scene. It was later determined that drowning was the primary cause of death.

Scuba safety requirements would prevent workplace deaths, bill supporters say

Speaking to the House Workforce, Labor, and Economic Development Finance and Policy Committee Tuesday, an emotional [REDACTED] said a summer job with a company that clears lakes and ponds of aquatic plants sounded ideal to his son Joe, who loved the water. He would strap on masks and gear, head into the water and harvest weeds. May 24, 2024, was Joe's third day on the job and his first using scuba gear. He had about 15 minutes of training.

The lake was a former quarry called a dirty lake, and the day was so overcast, the streetlights went on. Joe disappeared in what was supposed to be 6 or 8 feet of water but turned out to be 20 feet when they found him. A coworker tried to revive Joe but wasn't CPR certified and called the fire department. Despite heroic efforts, he never regained consciousness and passed away a few days later.

Investigation Summary

Six individuals, including Employee #1 (deceased), were performing underwater work to clean out lake weeds 10-15 feet below the surface of Lake Lavon in Apple Valley, MN. After several minutes, coworkers noticed they had not seen bubbles from the deceased and found him unresponsive 15-20 feet underwater. The employee was wearing a wetsuit, scuba mask, and weight belt, but the regulator was out of his mouth at the time of discovery. This was the employee's first time diving underwater and using scuba equipment, and he had received 10-15 minutes of training prior to the dive from a coworker who was not scuba certified. The employee was pronounced dead at the scene.
